175 YEARS OF PUBLISHING 1807 1982

Developmental Psychobiology will publish original reports of research that contribute to understanding behaviorally related developmental processes. We welcome the submission of manuscripts whose focus is on behavioral development, whether in the embryo, fetus, neonate, or juvenile animal. Anatomical, physiological, biochemical, hormonal, pharmacological, genetic and evolutionary approaches are also appropriate—in fact, we strongly support such multidisciplinary work when the relationship to behavioral development is clear. Experimental and descriptive studies, whether carried out in the laboratory or field and irrespective of the particular species being studied, are considered to be equally meritorious. The submission of studies using invertebrates, humans, or any other animal is encouraged. We thus invite workers in all fields of psychology, biology, medicine and neuroscience who are involved in ontogenetic studies of behavior to submit manuscripts to Developmental Psychobiology.

Studies presented in a report should represent a thorough, though not necessarily exhaustive, analysis of the research topic. Brief reports or papers merely describing techniques are discouraged. Developmental Psychobiology will also publish Comments, consisting of short discussions of issues and problems of interest to other researchers, as well as Book Reviews. Authors should consult the Editors on the preparation and appropriateness of such contributions. Developmental Psychobiology will occasionally publish critical reviews of recent research. Such reviews should consist of a synthesis and a critical evaluation of the field, and should not be merely a synopsis of the literature. Theoretical papers may also be published, especially if they include a critical analysis of the pertinent literature such that they are likely to promote further research in the field. Finally, announcements of events and other new items of general interest to the readers are solicited and will be published on an irregular basis.

Developmental Psychobiology is the offical publication of the International Society for Developmental Psychobiology. However, membership in the Society is not a prerequisite for submission or publication. Manuscripts are evaluated entirely on their merit. Detailed information on manuscript preparation can be found on the inside of the rear cover page of any recent issue of the journal.
